

“MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING”

November 3, 2012

By Michael Erlewine (Michael@Erlewine.net)

I am so programmed to think in linear terms, in straight lines, especially the line of time always stretching infinitely forward. In a way it does. But it is a bad habit (I have) to think that the rewards of progress, the accumulation of success, and life's high points also come just at the end of time. And, of course, this is partially true as well. However, I find it a big mistake to just wait for those golden moments of the 'future' to show up somewhere down-the-line.

Partial truths are just that, partial, and not complete. Sure, there is such a thing as progress, the rewards of sublimation, and working toward a goal. Yet life is more cyclic than linear. It cycles or circles.

Rewards don't always come at the end of time, the pie in the sky, the 'heaven when we die'. Cycles suggest that (instead) our peaks happen along the way as we travel the road of life, and not just at the live-long end.

With that in mind, when looking at the astrology of today, it appears to me that certain celestial events seem to be reaching a climax or clarity-point today, and not tomorrow, the next day, or someday. In other words, friends (and I am talking to myself here), "Gather Ye Rosebuds While Ye May," and today just might be one of those small peaks in time when circumstances converge to make this day stand out and be a little exceptional. The same could be said of yesterday, as we have been building up to this.

I tend to view the ever-changing patterns of the planets in the heavens as like a vast kaleidoscope, one that comes into focus for a moment and then moves on to something else. My point is that today looks like one of those times of focus, a pivot or clear turning point, albeit perhaps a small one. Remember the old line "On a clear day, you can see forever," that is, if you look.

I will do my best to be aware today, soak it up, take it in, celebrate it, or whatever I can manage to do at this time.

I offer this photo I took yesterday as a sign, signature, and witness to the moment. May we all share this day, the events and awareness it brings, and not let it slip by unnoticed.
