

FLOWERING SEDUM

March 19, 2011

By Michael Erlewine (Michael@Erlewine.net)

Here is a photo from yesterday of the flowering sedum I have been watching. Spring is finally starting to come and the last couple of days have been much warmer with some sun. The snow pack is melting and the ground is starting to appear again in patches. The masses of ice built up from winter have slid off the roof and are slamming into the ground, shaking the whole house. No sign of flowers yet but I have heard that about an hour and one half south the sound of the spring peepers has been heard, but not around here yet.

Once the snow is all gone the earth will warm up and stop acting like a freezer. I am getting outside more for walks and the sun feels great. Hope everyone in the north is warming up.

Download and view (menu at left) this image in high res for a treat.

